How much do you need when traveling around Bolivia?

One of the most diverse countries you can visit in South America, Bolivia has literally something for everyone here. Those into adventure can hike through the Amazon Jungle from Rurrenabaque, whilst La Paz and Sucre have plenty of unique sights to see in and around the city center.

In this guide we'll look at the typical costs you can expect when traveling Bolivia, such as for accommodation, food and getting around. As well as recommending some of the best tours you can head on, we'll also answer your most burning questions in our FAQ section.

Of course you can spend extra for a more luxurious experience, however it will still be cheaper than what you would spend in other South American countries.

Budget travelers and backpackers can expect to spend roughly $20 a day in Bolivia, whilst those who want an upgrade in experience (such as private rooms, eating in nicer establishments) can budget for around $30-40 a day.

This budget only covers accommodation, food and a few extras (like beers, a walking tour or entrance etc). Other costs such as flights and day tours will need to be planned with a different budget in mind.

If you have been traveling in neighboring Chile or Brazil before entering Bolivia, then you'll be pleasantly surprised at just how cheap accommodation can be here.

If you're traveling on a strict budget, then dorm beds in hostels are a great way of keeping your costs down. You can expect to spend between $5-7 a night for a dorm bed, and in some hostels (such as the larger chains) you'll also have extras like an on-site bar and consistently hot showers.

If heading to Santa Cruz, then we recommend staying at Mi Bella, which is a comfortable and sleek apartment located in the center of the city. As well as including high-speed WiFi and air conditioning, you'll also be close to the main plaza and cathedral.
