Strong evidence is crucial to support a case at a Tribunal.

You need to cast doubt that the yellow box junction is legally and technically correct.

Civil cases are based on the balance of probabilities, whereas criminal cases have to be proved beyond reasonable doubt.

You need to have sufficient evidence to have at least a 50% chance of succeeding in overturning a decision at a Tribunal.

There are two types of evidence – direct evidence and circumstantial evidence.

Circumstantial evidence is that which a Tribunal will be asked to draw an inference. That is a common-sense conclusion that can be drawn from the evidence and facts presented to them.

The bigger the inference, the weaker the evidence.

Ive just received a PCN contravention 31J. My front wheels are on the line and I would deny over the line however my front bumper would be. Is it worth contesting? The car in front of me is clearly stopped on the other side inside the box. I am a careful driver and have not obstructed any traffic. Seems very harsh.

Another question: why the yellow boxes are not clearly indicated by road signs to be more visible? or is it just a trick of the councils to not make them visible?

Is there any restriction on the size of a box junction?
