Belgium is one of the best countries to visit in Europe, and many people even move to the country as a result of visiting.

If you are considering moving to Belgium, you may want to learn a bit more about the living cost in Belgium.

It's particularly important in today's world post-pandemic where there is a cost of living crisis in most countries.

Without further ado, let's get into it.

Naturally, the living cost in Belgium varies depending on where you choose to live. Living in an apartment in central Brussels is going to have a different cost to living in an apartment in Flanders.

To give a fair reflection, I will give an average across the whole of Belgium, and where possible, give averages for specific regions where there are huge discrepancies, such as housing.

I've broken the living cost in Belgium down into lots of categories ranging from utilities to gym memberships. It covers pretty much everything most people would consider the 'essentials'.

Speaking overall though, a family of four's estimated monthly costs (without rent) are approximately EUR3,000.

A single person without rent will likely spend approximately EUR850 on the cost of living each month.

But let's break that down a bit further;

Across the whole of Belgium, the average price for a house in Belgium was EUR281,705 in 2021. It continued to rise throughout the first half of 2022 but unfortunately, I can't find any data. But in better news, the cost of housing is expected to go down slightly throughout 2023.

If you are renting, here are the average prices for a 1-bedroom apartment in the city centre in the most popular cities in Belgium.
