Nouakchott battery life

The team quickly learned that their smartphones did not have the battery life to work all day, even when they did not use data connections or other functions that consume batteries more quickly. Trufi procured portable power banks for everyone on the team so that they could trace routes without losing power.

The city has had massive and unconstrained growth, driven by the North African drought, since the beginning of the 1970s; hundreds of thousands moved there in search of a better life. The official censuses showed 134,000 residents in 1977 and 393,325 in 1988, although both figures were probably smaller than reality.
